Research Interests

My research focuses on the development of mathematical and statistical methods related to stochastic branching processes. In particular, I am interested in applying these methods to study the evolutionary history of species diversification and the dynamics of infectious diseases in structured populations. To conduct this research, I draw on techniques and concepts from a range of fields, including birth–death processes, matrix-analytic methods (MAMs), statistical data analysis, Bayesian inference, machine learning, and evolutionary biology.

Employment

2023 – Postdoctoral Research Associate
Department of Biology
Washington University in Saint Louis, St. Louis MO
Developing mathematical models for studying evolutionary processes and biodiversity patterns.
